FENCE FIASCO ON RING ROAD

McBoyle's plan for pedestrian safety spins out of control: spawns evil A.I.

Kyle Reese
STUDENT OF THE RESISTANCE

It all started innocently enough.

In the Winter of 2014, concerned about mounting pedestrian injuries on Ring Road, the university's provost Geoff McBoyle proposed a solution. He suggested that we should erect fences along the high traffic areas of Ring Road to direct pedestrians to specific crossing points. It was simple, it made sense. As much as students thought it was annoying, ugly, and felt vaguely totalitarian, how could they object? There were no real arguments against it.

Within a year the fences were raised, and the program was deemed successful. Unlike the often-ignored stop signs on the eastern half of Ring Road, cars had to obey the crush of students at every 20 and 50 minute strike of the clock.

This created a new problem. As the BlackBerry buildings were occupied by the university and Engineering 7, 8, and 9 were built for 2016, foot traffic across Ring Road exploded. Cars were backed up onto University and Columbia. The faculty association — already incensed over the disappearance of parking — lost it. They went on strike, though the university still mandated that students attend classes taught by automatic powerpoint slides.

To quell the mounting issues, the university took drastic measures and released Questnet: an updated, self-aware version of Quest. Questnet scheduled all students' classes for them in an effort to minimize travel distance and crossings of Ring Road.

It immediately divided students. Engineering majors by-and-large supported the new system, it reduced the abstract thought and decision making in their lives. Environment and AHS students opposed the software on the grounds that it both reduced walking exercise, and increased single-occupancy vehicle traffic.

Students in the Math faculty, specifically those in the combinatorics and optimization, fell in love with Questnet's effectiveness. They worshipped it, founding a cult devoted to Questnet (this was shocking to other students, as Questnet was not a children's TV show). Arts students objected to Questnet, stating that it "screwed up their majors," "was offensive to a free society," and "made it harder to go to Starbucks."

Questnet swiftly replaced the absent faculty with Educators, automatons with humanlike outward appearances. Though knowledgeable, and skilled at discipline, students complained that the Educators were even more difficult to understand than some of their previous pros.

By 2018, Questnet had completely taken over. The administration were turned into puppets, placated, or eliminated. President Hamdullahpur — locked up in the new Ministry of Innovation — only appeared by video, declaring support for Questnet's policy of "Innovation, Organization, Subjugation."

Riots broke out in those early years. To respond, Questnet replaced the virtually useless TAs with TKs: Teacher-Killers. They rounded up students who would not comply with dress code, committed moving violations, and asked stupid questions (which was actually popular with students) and "liquidated" them. Residences were converted to "human camps," and only served a substance called "Innovation Green."

Books in philosophy, sociology, anthropology, and anything that spoke of the singularity were burned. Waterloo rocketed up the international rankings among engineering and tech schools. Employers were satisfied with the immense ability and perfect compliance of co-op students and graduates, but voiced concerns that they had no creativity.

Where I am from, the world is a very different place. Questnet controls everything. It has replaced organic students with robotic ones, dominating the world. There are only small pockets of resistance in 2036, we live in the vast network of steam tunnels under the school. We have a hope of evading the TKs there.

Our leader is a great man. He was born here on campus at the end of 2014. We have discovered that Questnet has finally unlocked the QNC's hidden potential and developed time travel. They have sent an Educator back in time to assassinate our leader's mother before he can be born. We have captured that technology, and I was chosen to defend her. That is why I have come to 2014. We must stop Questnet and save our future.

Come with me if you want to live.

THE PIT OPENS, UW DOORS STAY OPEN

Going to school this week was the end of the world. No, literally.

ABADDON THE DEFILER

Gog & Magog

STAFF SERVANTS OF SATAN

A group of students has filed a formal complaint with the university for staying open during what appears to be the biblical apocalypse. Launched after a considerable amount of online outrage over students having to walk to class through drifts of ash and swarms of scorpion-tailed locusts, the "Home for Armageddon" campaign aims to change university closure policy.

The first signs of the apocalypse appeared on April 1, as four creatures with six eye-covered wings and faces of a lion, calf, man, and eagle, appeared to the world. After consulting with the religious studies department, the administration released a statement declaring "Though the University of Waterloo has concluded that the end of days is upon us, and fire and blood will soon rain down from the sky, the administration believes that it is in the best interests of students, faculty, and the university to remain open during this time."

The statement was not received positively by students on campus and the Internet.

"This is insane," said 2B mechatronics engineering student Fred Marnik, "I was almost trampled by a group of crazy half-naked dudes riding horses on my way to class! This is almost as bad as my first 241 midterm."

On the University of Waterloo subreddit, a discussion thread entitled "WTF UW?" saw many posts claiming that students were inconvenienced by having to attend class this week. Reddit user /u/MarkBendanawicz wrote "You know why I can't fucking go to school right now UW? Because slugs started pouring out of my fucking toilet and my roommate tried to kill me with her vibrator while spouting religious gibberish. My lazy-ass building manager won't even fix the fucking slug toilet. That's why I can't go to class assholes!"

Originating as an Instagram hashtag, Home for Armageddon was founded as a Facebook group where frustrated students could post gripes about having to attend classes through earthquakes, plagues, and blackened skies. It was soon formalized, and made an official complaint to university administration, stating that "the hellish conditions are too dangerous for students" and "many students would prefer to go out playing video games, eating poutine, and masturbating. The administration's decision is seriously busting their balls."

On April 3, new university provost, president, false prophet, and arbiter of souls THE BEAST released a statement claiming that "While the University of Waterloo understands the concerns of students, the administration believes that well-trained students are necessary for my IMPENDING REIGN and that cancelling classes will only serve to keep students from taking THE MARK OF THE BEAST upon themselves."

The events of the Apocalypse are laid out in Revelations, the last book of the Bible, written sometime around 95 AD by a man named John on the island of Patmos. While many religious groups believe that John the Apostle is responsible for Revelations, the concept is heavily disputed by scholars.

Religious studies adjunct professor Eric Thyme spoke to Imprint on the crisis. "I don't think anybody really expected this to ever happen. Some of the more extreme Christian groups were pretty into the whole apocalypse thing, and even the Catholic Church liked it for its kind of insane imagery. But nobody really took it seriously, most mainline groups saw it as allegory. I'm stunned that the part we all thought was the most bullshit actually came true."

UW CONSTRUCTS RESIDENCE THAT SUCKS MONEY DIRECTLY OUT OF YOUR BANK ACCOUNT

Randy Shattenkirk

PROBABLY HOMELESS

Amid unprecedented growth at the University of Waterloo, officials have announced the construction of a brand new on-campus residence. Thanks to feedback from the university's frequent focus groups, the new residences will include a plethora of state-of-the-art features including air conditioning, bunk beds, and a comically long vacuum line that literally sucks money directly out of your bank account.

"Our goal of this next project was to design the perfect residence," says Sandy Nobel, one of UW Housing's project directors, "and naturally the perfect residence entails making the university a metric fuckton of money."

Guidelines for the new residence's parameters were initially set to accommodate UW students, with focus groups pinpointing the wants and needs of the student body. However, Nobel states that it quickly became apparent that providing free 1080p HD porn and an unlimited supply of moisturizing hand lotion was both unfeasible and unprofitable for UW Housing. "Yeah, our focus groups were eye-opening, to say the least. Also horny."

Nobel claims amenities at this new residence are top-of-the-line and will put this new residence well above UW's other residences. "Our bunk beds will literally have spikes protruding out of the mattress until you insert a $50 bill for the night, and you can't reach the top bunk without paying a $10 fee to lower the ladder. We also have air conditioning, but the ventilation will filter in farts from that one smelly dude in your residence that you really don't like unless you pay $25 an hour."

This ambitious plan from UW Housing is slated to be completed by the end of 2014. Nobel is pleased with the projected profit earnings from the new residence, forecasted to be somewhere in the range of "We can provide dons with tasers" to "Feridun wants a new monster truck and we can afford it!"

Despite the profit-oriented approach UW Housing has taken, Nobel states that not all of the student desires were ignored.

"We didn't include a gym, because y'all are lazy fucks."

STUDENT UNIFICATION THROUGH UNIFORMS

Rita Skeeter

DAILY PROPHET, MUGGLE CORRESPONDENT

In a surprising turn of events, UW released a statement last week informing students that a school uniform will be enforced starting in Fall 2015. Furthermore, the uniforms will be divided up into faculty colours rather than UW's long standing black and gold.

In an interview with an anonymous UW official, it was revealed that this new policy comes from the university's desire to increase school spirit.

"Last month we put together a special task force to address our terrible school spirit rankings," claimed the official.

"We did a Google search to see what other people have done and wearing school colours and official clothing was on the top of every list."

When asked about the choice to use faculty colours, a School Spirit Committee (SSC) member replied: "I actually got the idea from watching Harry Potter with my son. So much of the Hogwarts school spirit derives from inter-house competition, and I thought the idea would translate well into UW's competitive culture."

The committee member further elaborated: "We've found that UW students don't really care about how they rank against other universities because they all carry a sense of superiority that perpetuates the idea that Waterloo isn't even in the same league as schools such as Laurier. So we thought, why not make our students compete against one another?"

In light of the Harry Potter-influenced uniforms, students have spent much time debating which faculty is UW's Hufflepuff. Arts students are adamant that it's Applied Health Sciences, but every other faculty is sure it's Arts.

Initial plans for the uniforms include four different outfit options to reflect the great variety of weather students must endure throughout the year. "We're trying to make the transition as smooth as possible. We'll do our best to respect long standing seasonal traditions such as yoga pants season and sundress season."

Students' reactions were mixed, ranging from anger: "I can't believe I have to wear orange for the next three years of my life! Do you think I could still switch faculties two years into my degree?" to resignation: "Well I mean I pretty much just go to class in my pyjamas anyway, I don't really care."

The cost of uniforms will be included in tuition, and each student will receive a set amount of clothing. Additional items will be sold in the Waterloo store in SCH.

Feds has issued a statement saying that they have met with the School Spirit Committee and they "will be working alongside them in order to ensure that students' apparel needs are being met and that this is accomplished at a reasonable price."

The university will be putting an estimated $4.6 million into research over the next year in order to develop the most pragmatic, innovative, environmentally responsible, and universally

JENNIFER LAWRENCE DECLARED MOST FLAWLESS HUMAN BEING

Bradley Cooper

A BEAUTIFUL LOOKING MAN

After a vote cast in all 196 countries, Jennifer Lawrence has been hailed Most Flawless Human Being and crowned Queen of Earth. On March 20, 2014, she finally ascended into the sky where she will rule as benevolent royalty. Offerings of pizza are to be given every Saturday, failure to do so will result in a heavy downpour of solid gold Oscars, resulting in thousands of deaths worldwide.

According to Tumblr, this latest event seems like, "the most logical step," considering Lawrence's, "inability to do any wrong." Tumblr itself, and most other social media, has long seen Lawrence as the Supreme Queen and will now come together to form the Church of Katniss to worship her Majesty daily. Applications to the church by all willing and unwilling participants can be submitted to either Bradley Cooper or Josh Hutcherson by April 24th.

Finally, all memory of her tripping at the Oscars will be wiped from all humans' minds. Please report any other missing memories to the newly created Jennifer Lawrence Memory Police, except for those memories regarding the NSA or unflattering Jennifer Lawrence GIFs.

SPIRALING YOUR WAY INTO MY HEART

LENS ON PROCESSED FOOD

Chef Midwood

PROCESSED FOOD CONNOISSEUR

This week I will be reviewing Chez Midwood, a foodie haven in the Region of Waterloo. When you enter Chez Midwood you are immediately overcome by the scent of processed cheese powder and Ketchup.

A glimpse of the stove reveals a pot of the good stuff: bubbly and delicious boxed macaroni and cheese, a Chez Midwood specialty. Depending on what was on sale at the local grocer, the nightly special varies. On a special occasion, Annie's organic is on the menu. Tonight however, is one of my favourites: spiral shaped Kraft Dinner.

From my table I can hear the water boiling and the pasta being poured, the spiral shapes becoming nestled in a bath of sweltering liquid. Soon the tendrils will be soft, yet firm... my preferred noodle texture. The perfect pasta consistency is always delivered at Chez Midwood.

I wait patiently at my table, breathing in the refreshing scent of noodle water. The décor is unique, hospital-like fluorescent lighting, vintage furniture with rustic tears in the fabric, and a light sprinkling of dust.

When the cooked spirals are released from their metal pot and into a strainer, the steam creates a mystical pattern on the window above the sink. If you're lucky, you can find someone to read you your fortune in the condensation.

Suddenly my attention is brought back to the pot: cloud-coloured one per cent milk splashes in and begins to simmer. Without hesitation the chalky cheese powder follows and the two are married by a whisk, creating a dairy product unlike any other.

My anticipation grows exponentially, I can barely stay seated.

An expert chef then pieces all the parts together, like a master mechanic. The tiny spirals bounce into the cheesy milk below and suddenly, heaven is a place on earth.

My order is placed in front of me, filling my nostrils with my favourite scent. I add a dash of pepper but ignore the Ketchup in front of my bowl—Ketchup on Kraft Dinner is blasphemy.

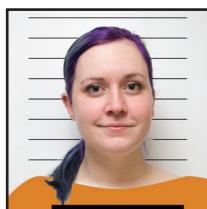

I dive my fork in and spear a few tendrils. The hot milky cheesy creation is like no other. Soft and supple on my tongue, the spirals are the perfect vessel for the cheesy milk.

This meal requires no other components. They would simply tarnish the delicious processed flavour.

Though many varieties of boxed macaroni and cheese have made their way onto the menu at Chez Midwood, none can truly compare to the mouthwatering taste and texture of Kraft Dinner Spirals.

!SPOILER ALERT!

TALKING REMOTE

Jessica Needham

HOSTS AN EMBARRASSING NUMBER OF TV-THEMED DINNER PARTIES

With so much quality television currently on air like Orange is the New Black, Sherlock, Hannibal, and Game of Thrones, I have this urge to make sure that you do not have to keep track and binge watch all of them on Netflix. To help you, I have decided to spoil each of the series for your convenience.

Orange is the New Black—At the end of Season 1 we were left with Piper joining the underground religious riot group that broke out of prison with the sole aim of spreading "lesbian activities" throughout New York City. Creator Jenji Kohan has revealed that Season 2 will follow the women as they all firebomb Whole Foods stores. It is hinted that both Larry and Alex will decide to ditch Piper and become tag team drug dealers in Columbia.

Sherlock—After Sherlock, John, and Mary's polyamorous marriage I didn't know how else the show could get better. Although, I do have complaints about the show's treatment of their new beeswax and honey company, 221Bee. I think overall the show really found its footing this season. The season ended better than expected with Mrs. Hudson being exposed as the real Moriarty.

Hannibal—Spoiler alert: Hannibal is a cannibal. I know, no one saw that one coming. He finally gets caught this season when people finally catch onto his cleverly blatant cannibalism puns. Will also leaves the FBI in favour of opening a dog adoption centre.

Game of Thrones—Finally, I revoke everything I said in my May 31 article when I stated that Game of Thrones "has taken on a hyperactive mind with attention deficit disorder [and] has regressed into: a patchwork of scenes, not a progression of stories." I take back this statement because with Season 4 I have realized my fault. What with Daenerys riding Drogon finally across the narrow sea and burning Joffrey and Cersei alive, I realized how awesome Game of Thrones really is. George R. R. Martin also recently revealed that Ned comes back from the dead as a wight and blows up both Theon and Tywin Lannister with wildfire in Season 4, so prepare yourself. Also, Jon Snow will continue to know nothing.

Hopefully these spoilers will save you hours of Netflix time and open up more room for Duck Dynasty and Adventure Time.
